

THE VILLAGE

Sunday Doctrine

Every Sunday · 11AM - 2PM · Hideout Miami

Free. Always. Come as you are.

You leave lighter than you arrived.

And after enough Sundays, it stops being an event.

It becomes part of life.

This is the internal doctrine -- what The Village is, why it works, and what we protect. Not a flyer. Not a pitch. The orientation for people already inside it.

And what it isn't

Miami categorizes things fast. People need to know what they're walking into.

The Village is not a networking event, not nightlife, not self-help, not manufactured community, and not a dating mechanism. It is not trying to be impressive, exclusive, or curated in an obvious way.

It is warm social contact without friction, performance, or agenda -- a Sunday that feels like a Sunday. Same place, same time, every week, until showing up becomes the most natural thing in the world.

Reliability creates trust. Trust creates rhythm. Rhythm creates belonging.

That is the whole mechanism. Everything else serves it.

The city already wants this

Sunday in Miami has its own energy. People are already drifting, already looking for somewhere to land. The warmth, the patio culture, the way the city softens on a Sunday morning -- it's all there. It's been there.

The problem isn't that people don't want to connect. It's that most Sunday options are performative, expensive, alcohol-centered, over-programmed, or socially high-friction. You show up and immediately have to be something.

The Village isn't inventing connection. It's removing the friction around something Miami already wants.

Same place. Same time. Every week. Good music already in the room when you arrive. Some people moving, some talking, no one needing anything from you. Drift between conversation and solitude. Nobody performing. Nobody optimizing. Show up enough times and strangers become familiar faces. Familiar faces become people you actually know.

Simply stated

When -- Every Sunday. 11AM to 2PM. No exceptions, no cancellations, no 'we'll see.' The consistency is the product.

Where -- Hideout Miami -- indoors and patio, both active. People move between them naturally.

Who -- Open door. Come alone, come with your crew, bring someone new. The right energy self-selects.

Cost -- Free. Always. No ticket, no cover, no minimum, no ask. This never changes.

Drinks -- Hideout has food and non-alcoholic drinks. Beer and wine from Edge Market next door -- BYOB welcome.

04 / THE MUSIC

The social solvent

Music is not the backdrop. Music is the reason the room works.

Without it, this is a coffee shop with extra steps. With the right music, it becomes a field -- a shared atmosphere everyone inhabits together without having to acknowledge it, perform it, or talk about it.

Music absorbs what kills casual gatherings: awkward silence, the pressure to hold conversation, the moment when you don't know anyone and don't know where to stand. It gives people permission to be present -- to move or not, to talk or not, to drift or not.

The set is eclectic -- whatever is right for that Sunday. No genre mandate. Full trust in whoever carries the music. The only standard: carry the room without demanding its attention.

When the music is right, nobody comments on it. They just stay longer than they planned.

05 / WHAT WE PROTECT

The doctrine

■ Free. Forever.

The moment there is a price, the contract changes. People ask if it is worth it. They arrive with proportional expectations. The casualness that makes this work disappears. Free. This does not get revisited.

■ Every Sunday. No exceptions.

Not most Sundays. Not when the energy is right. Every Sunday. People need to know it will be there before they build it into their rhythm. Break consistency and rhythm weakens. Keep going and it becomes infrastructure.

■ The music leads.

Set the conditions. Then get out of the way. No engineered moments, no programmed activities, no forced interaction. The music carries the room. What happens inside belongs to the people.

■ Open door. Behavioral standard.

Anyone can walk in. But the room has a character and it gets protected. Presence over performance. Participation over opportunism. The person who needs to be the loudest thing in the room has misread what this is.

■ Warmth is structural.

A beautiful cold room is a dead room. The warmth is genuine, not decorative. People feel it when they walk in. It is designed, not hoped for.

■ The village travels.

Hideout is home base. Not the identity. First it earns its rhythm here -- same patio, same Sunday, same people building familiarity. When the ritual is real, it can go anywhere. The location is incidental. The people are the point.

06 / WHAT A GOOD SUNDAY FEELS LIKE

The feeling we're building toward

You arrive without obligation. The music is already in the room. Some people are moving. Some are deep in conversation on the patio. Nobody needs anything from you.

You drift -- between people you know and people you're about to know, between inside and outside, between dancing and just standing there feeling it. Time softens. You stop tracking it.

A friend brings someone new. Someone who came alone last week is back -- and now introducing themselves to someone else. The room is doing the work.

You leave lighter than you arrived. Not because something extraordinary happened -- because something ordinary happened correctly.

Good music. Good company. No pressure. A Sunday that felt like a Sunday.

Do it enough weeks and it stops being a thing you go to. It becomes part of how you live.

*Design the conditions. Protect the standard.
Remove the friction. Trust the people.*
